Construction and Construction Defect

Construction and construction defect litigation is complex and requires expertise in several areas of the law including: contracts, product liability, architects, engineers, toxic tort and insurance issues. Also, OSHA and other regulatory standards tend to complicate cases that frequently involve large sums of money and multiple parties. Our experience includes all of these fields of law and provides our clients with a knowledgeable and efficient defense of their construction and construction defect litigation.

Bonner Kiernan lawyers presently handle an array of cases that range from claims of severe bodily injury resulting from exposure to toxic substances to economic loss claims based upon alleged failure of construction materials or poor workmanship and construction defect. The Firm's attorneys are also at the forefront of significant, building-related cases involving alleged exposure to mold and toxic fumes, arising from defects in the design of major commercial structures, or deficient techniques in construction and remediation. (See Environmental Law).

Our clients include design professionals, general contractors, construction site owners, construction materials manufacturers and companies involved in almost every trade. Our work in this area comes from both insurance companies and the corporate sector.

We have particular expertise in work site and excavation-related bodily injury and property damage matters. Our attorneys have developed a close working relationship with engineering, construction and design experts that enable us to provide superior defense despite the complex technical issues that arise in construction and construction defect matters.
